"hidden genetic diversity" of tomato represents a collective resistance to an array of viruses. Tomato is an important horticultural crop and is afflicted with an ever-increasing number of pathogens of viral origin. The global decline in tomato productivity is exacerbated by the existence of a high number of virus-resistant varieties and the limited knowledge of resistance mechanisms. A major part of the genetic diversity of the tomato genome has not been used so far for plant breeding and genetic engineering. Here, we present evidence that the 'hidden genetic diversity' of tomato is a collective, broad-spectrum resistance to a wide range of viruses. In the course of our genetic screening of Arabidopsis thaliana mutants we identified two mutant alleles of the phospholipase D alpha 1 gene (PLA1), which are effective in the inhibition of the tobacco rattle virus (TRV) movement. Our results indicate that TRV can establish self-propagation, indicating that PLA1-mediated inhibition of the viral genome movement is involved in a concerted effort to control TRV in the cell. In addition, we show that the starch-invertase-amylase inhibitor 1 (STA1) is involved in the inhibition of severe symptom development upon TRV infection. We analyzed a large collection of tomato (Lycopersicon esculentum) accessions for their resistance to 14 different single- and double-stranded RNA viruses and characterized that in several cases resistance was co-segregating with a mutation in the PLA1 gene. We show that some accessions carrying a transgene encoding the chloroplastic PLA1 protein
