

FIFA's senior technical team has developed the game around this core engine and features the best player models ever, with new motion-capture technology that unlocks unprecedented realism in player animation. To bring this to life, the team has used a wide variety of new technologies and tools that are key to delivering a deep and authentic experience. This includes integrating both physical and virtual environments using the latest in next-gen technologies. This video shows the new features of FIFA 22, including its laser scan technology, added player reaction and player models and design, and animations. Scientific and cultural distance determine the effects of species replacement. Explaining why biodiversity is diminishing, and thereby predicting the responses of biodiversity in the face of species replacement, is a complex challenge. While authors of ecological theory use various distance measures to predict vegetation change, we do not know how these measures relate to how species replacement affects biodiversity. Here we define the correlation between these distance measures and the effects of species replacement on biodiversity. We used generalized linear models to analyze plant species replacement in East African savannahs. We found that species replacement had a positive effect on biodiversity. However, species replacement had a weaker effect on diversity in local-scale plant communities than in regional plant communities. Species replacement had the strongest positive effect on biodiversity, and this effect was greatest in local-scale plant communities. In regional-scale plant communities, species replacement had a stronger effect on biodiversity in low-diversity plant communities than in high-diversity plant communities. Our analysis suggests that low diversity leads to an increase in species replacement. We conclude that distance measures need to be interpreted carefully, but their use may be promising in understanding and predicting the responses of biodiversity in the face of species replacement. This invention relates to the feeding of hot molten metal from a furnace in a continuous casting plant. In the case of continuous casting plants, such as twin rollers, it is known to arrange the upper strand guide means and the mould carrier structure as a common carrier unit which is laterally adjustable so as to maintain it in a desired position relative to the fixed lower mould in which the strand is cast. By means of a rotatable feed wheel, the mould is repeatedly contacted by the molten metal and by a cooling means for the mould, which is continuously supplied with cooled water by a circuit for cooling the mould. In order to be able to feed the strand under the continuously varying conditions required in the casting operation, the rotatable feed wheel is supported by a hydraulic support device, which
