1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to computer memory. In one example, the present invention relates to devices and methods for providing a high speed, low latency random access memory for image sensing, such as that used in video cameras. 2. Description of the Prior Art Digital image sensing is used in a variety of applications, including, for example, video and still cameras, medical imaging, scientific research, traffic monitoring, and many others. Typically, an image sensor provides a digital picture element (pixel) value for each position of an array of positions. Accordingly, image data may be obtained by a single or multiple image sensor array for a single picture. A contemporary digital camera may store a camera shot image in a memory of a portable device, e.g., a personal digital assistant (PDA), a laptop, a mobile phone, a mobile computing device (e.g., a tablet). The memory of a mobile device may be volatile (e.g., an SRAM-based memory), non-volatile (e.g., an EEPROM-based memory), or some combination thereof. A recent trend is to provide the main memory of a mobile device with a random access memory (RAM) of DDR2 or DDR3 format so as to be capable of a high speed access. However, the cost of DDR2 and DDR3 memory is prohibitive for typical portable applications, as they can be several times the cost of conventional SRAM memories. Furthermore, in the imaging application, the available space is rather limited and the constraints for memory space are more demanding. For example, a high resolution camera includes a large array of image sensors and the memory of a large camera may be as large as 1 giga bytes. The cost of 1 giga bytes of DDR2 or DDR3 memory is even more prohibitive than in the case of a smaller memory array. Consequently, the requirements for the main memory of the image sensor in imaging applications are different than those for conventional SRAM memories. SRAM memories typically require lower power than DDR2 or DDR3 memory, but are slower and consume higher area and cost per bit than the newer memory technologies. Accordingly, there is a need for a memory system for use in imaging applications that is low cost and provide a high speed, low latency random access memory for image sensing, such as that used in video cameras. Furthermore, the content of a captured image may be retrieved, decompressed and manipulated during play back.
