What's new in Asteria:

.6.0 is released! Releases: 1.0.4 (released on 2016-01-30), 1.0.3 (released on 2016-01-11), 1.0.2 (released on 2016-01-09), 1.0.1 (released on 2016-01-02), 1.0.0 (released on 2016-01-01). Here is the changelog: Overview Several fixes and improvements have been added to the ZNN codebase over the past several weeks, with a number of important fixes and features tackled in Herman 2.5. As such, Herman 2.6.0 represents a significant maintenance release. Notable changes for Herman core include: All existing core functionality has been maintained. New functionality includes: Learning of inductive bias Better handling of right arrow jumps Explicitly tracking time for all

vectors and matrices returned Better recognition of a full suite of third party libraries A better interface for handling the Cascall@Home client Various other improvements, bug fixes, and documentation changes Here is the release changelog:

Core New Feature #51.1: Learning of inductive bias Herman 2.6.0 maintains the learning of inductive bias functionality as described in the current Learning of inductive bias paper. The version of bias learning available in this release is slightly more conservative and provides slightly more robust and efficient inference performance, but this can be disabled by the use of the optional Learning of inductive bias plugin. This means that the plugin will be a dependency when running a call to infer from a set of inputs, but the learner will not be used when not explicitly called upon.

New Feature #77.4: Better handling of right arrow jumps Herman 2.6.0 improves the recognition of the end of activity for call and return instructions by performing a right-shift operation instead of performing a left-shift operation. This improves precision, especially when there are multiple right-arrow operations nested within another instruction. In practice, this means: On STACK32 instructions, right-arrow jumps are no longer required to be sign-extended to form a right arrow. On STACK64 instructions, right-arrow jumps are no longer required to be sign-extended to form a right arrow. In practice, this means: Right-arrow jumps
