Endometriosis and Bacterial Pregnancy Associated with Endometriosis: A Case Report. Endometriosis is a common gynecological disorder in reproductive-aged women. However, pregnancy or ectopic pregnancy is extremely rare in these women. We report a case of ectopic pregnancy of the gestational type in a woman with endometriosis without an intrauterine pregnancy. A 34-year-old woman had been followed at our hospital for 5 years due to abdominal pain. As abdominal ultrasonography demonstrated a markedly increased amount of peritoneal fluid, she was referred to our hospital on suspicion of peritoneal cancer. Laparotomy and oophorectomy were performed. The resected fallopian tubes and ovaries showed areas of endometriosis with endometrioma-like cysts. A complete molar pregnancy was detected in the right ovary. Endometriosis as the origin of ectopic pregnancy has been reported. However, bacterial infection of the endometriosis and its effects in producing a molar pregnancy are reported less frequently.

By Keith Chen In my final post of the Tackling VC for Beginners series, I'll be discussing some fun points about consulting and the possibility of having a "day job." To kick off with, it's important to note that in the process of doing what you do, it is perfectly normal (even expected) to see a decline in income. Why? Because as you gain more and more experience in the industry, the opportunities for work increase. For example, I started in this industry as a VC associate with little to no experience, but as I've proven my worth by consistently writing thought leadership, collaborating on company pitches, etc., I've been brought on as an entrepreneur/VC/angel/consultant/random person to help them. The pay to do that has since declined quite a bit, as everyone is doing it. Another thing to consider is what you're getting paid for. If you're looking to make real dollars in the consulting space, you won't be doing what you love (which, for most of us, means working for startups). They'll find somebody
