I honestly believe that Adobe needs to invest more time and money into making the UI of the program more intuitive. I like that they added transparency to some interface elements, but I was not very happy when I found out that Photoshop was no longer using the previous system of having different tabs on the desktop. I felt confused and was not able to locate those tools the way I used to. A few additions to the interface, including using the cursor for zooming or tracking a file, were also more obvious changes than I expected. I understand that such things may not be a priority, but the old tab-based system made sense to me and was easy to use. I feel that it's not the main priority of developers. However, I do feel that a better UI is necessary to make Photoshop more productive. Both Adobe Lightroom and Photoshop are amazing programs. Neither one is perfect and both have things to learn. If I had to state my overall impression of the software, I would say that it's in the process of evolving. The combination of both Lightroom and Photoshop gives me a sense of power and comfort, but shadows still linger. With its impressive features and potential, it gives me the impression that it has a bright future ahead. I certainly plan to give it a shot, but when I think back about the software from the past, I feel that I should invest some of that effort back into the product. There are clearly many things I would like to see improved in the new version of Photoshop. You're probably wondering why. Well, it is kind of a big ask to ask Adobe to create another new feature, isn't it? That's why I picked up Photoshop and Lightroom. Without further ado, let's take a look at some of the specific problems with the new version of Photoshop.
