How can I change scope of a CSS property from HTML to a class? Is it possible to change the scope of a CSS property from a HTML document? Say I have the following: `Hello World .span { background-color: #0f0f0f; }` What I would like to do is to change the scope of background-color from the `to` the `and` tags. Is this possible? A: No, you cannot change the scope of an element (meaning which style sheet it's defined in) from HTML. That would be CSS itself. You can however change the scope of a property by using the `!important` rule: `body { background-color: #0f0f0f!important; }` You should only do this if you really really need to override that value.

California Gov. Jerry Brown on Monday signed a bill to protect more public lands and waters from development by requiring infrastructure projects to mitigate their negative impacts. The law was co-authored by Democratic Sens. Tom McClintock and Dianne Feinstein and passed with bipartisan support. It will go into effect in 2021. It will be the first state law since President Trump's 2017 budget proposal to require public agencies to "avoid, reduce, or mitigate impacts that result from large-scale infrastructure projects," the bill says. "Giving local, tribal, and state governments more authority to be stewards of their lands and waterways, and freeing up federal dollars to assist local communities in addressing climate change, are parts of [the federal] Green New Deal" the White House said in a statement last year. Brown vetoed a similar bill last year, and called it "a solution in search of a problem." California has a long history of leading the way on many environmental issues and was the first state to enact zero-emission vehicle requirements, said California Department of Transportation spokesman Scott Ballan.
